Introduction

Travel planning for both workplace and schools, has increasingly been a factor in tackling congestion for over a decade. It is growing up ... indeed it has learnt to walk ... and cycle. Travel Planning may have been around a few years, but still has time to grow and mature. The world is changing at a rapid pace ... travel planning is no longer the awkward teenager establishing its purpose in life. So what direction does it take? How does it avoid its role becoming tedious and inactive? How can it continue to benefit people? How does it remain fit and healthy?

The 2009 ACT TravelWise Autumn Conference provides an opportunity to find out just what shape travel planning is in. Delegates will be encouraged to discuss how much strength and vigour Travel Planning has; and examine what it can do for your health, the health of children, customers and employees ... and the health of your wallet.

Travel planning impacts on health in so many ways. One obvious connection is that the majority of sustainable travel choices increase physical activity. Healthy people tend to be more productive and ... well, healthier. That is good for you and good for business by way of more productivity and less time lost to sickness.

Access to health services is always a hot topic, and sure to generate some good debate at the conference. Travel Planning can impact on all business operations from where services are located and delivered, right to the thorny topic of car parking charges.

There is also the issue of whether the role of a Travel Planner is healthy. Are travel planning professionals receiving the TLC and appreciation that they deserve?

Receive the treatment you ought to have by coming along to the conference. You will have the opportunity to share your knowledge and experience with likeminded travel planning specialists and go away rejuvenated with new ideas.'
